MATT BURKE, SPORTS EDITOR

Outside Boston, everyone still thinks we're a "baseball town." That stereotype hasn't exactly been true in the past five years, though, as up until last week the Patriots and Celtics dominated the chatter around here. Even if this is short-lived with the Pats beginning their pre-season slate later this week, it is nice to have legit, old-school baseball buzz in this city again. The Red Sox, who could wind up with their best record ever when all is said and done, cannot be denied right now when it comes to who dominates the sports news cycle. For more, see Page 9 and metro.us.

GATHERING SET FOR CITY'S 3RD TALLEST BUILDING

I Boston Mayor Martin Walsh will join developers at the top of the 742-foot hotel and residential tower rising at One Dalton Street on Tuesday to help top off what will become the tallest residential building in New England. Officially dubbed the "Four Seasons Hotel and Private Residences One Dalton Street, Boston," the building will be the third tallest in Boston but the tallest building in New England that people will call home. The project broke ground in January 2015 and is expected to open in the first quarter of 2019, according to developers. When completed, the 61-story tower will include 215 Four Seasons hotel rooms and 174 condominiums. Walsh, the former head of the Building and Construction Trades Council, is scheduled to greet more than 700 Suffolk Construction laborers who have worked on the building Tuesday morning before heading to the top of the tower with developers Richard Friedman and John Fish "to check out the view."

STAR WITNESS ADMITS TO CRIMES WITH MANAFORT

2 Rick Gates, a longtime business associate of President Donald Trump's former campaign chairman Paul Manafort, on Monday testified at trial that he helped Manafort file false tax returns and did not disclose foreign bank accounts. Gates was expected to be a star witness in the government's case against Manafort, having pleaded guilty in February, and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors under a deal that could lead to a reduced sentence. "We did not submit the required form designating he had control over an offshore account," Gates told the jury in federal court in Alexandria, Virginia, on the fifth day of the trial. When prosecutor Greg Andres asked why, Gates replied: "At Mr. Manafort's direction." Gates also testified he and Manafort knew it was a crime because they had been notified by Manafort's accountants in emails. Manafort's attorneys have signaled they will seek to blame Gates and have accused him of embezzling millions of dollars from Manafort. Gates and Manafort have known each other for two decades and ran a multimillion-dollar political consulting business.

SCREEN LEGEND REDFORD TO RETIRE FROM ACTING

4 Oscar winner Robert Redford will retire from acting following this autumn's "The Old Man & The Gun," the 81-year-old told Entertainment Weekly. Redford, best known for films such as "Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid," plays a seasoned bank robber in the new movie, which is scheduled to debut in theaters in September. "Never say never, but I pretty well concluded that this would be it for me in terms of acting, and [I'll] move toward retirement after this because I've been doing it since I was 21," Redford told the magazine.

"I thought, well, that's enough. And why not go out with something that's very upbeat and positive?" he added. In the film, Redford plays Forrest Tucker, a real-life career criminal who was caught robbing banks 17 times. Each time he was jailed but managed to escape. "To me, that was a wonderful character to play at this point in my life," Redford said of Tucker, whose robberies spanned more than 60 years. "It made me wonder: I wonder if he was not averse to getting caught so that he could enjoy the real thrill of his life, which is to escape?"

AT LEAST 40 SHOT, 4 KILLED
IN CHICAGO GUN VIOLENCE

5 At least 40 people were shot in Chicago between midnight Saturday and early Sunday morning, with four fatalities, city police said Sunday, a stark violent streak in a city where authorities say gun violence has been decreasing this year. "These were both random and targeted shootings on our streets," said Fred Waller, chief of the patrol division of the Chicago Police Department, in a press conference. He said most of the shootings are connected to gang violence in the city of about 2.7 million people, the third-largest in the United States.

Police said gunmen targeted a block party, a gathering after a funeral, and other gatherings on a night where thousands of people gathered for a downtown concert. Local media reported that the brunt of the violence happened in the city's West Side, where 25 people were shot in separate attacks. Waller touted that shootings in 2018 were down from last year. The Chicago Tribune, which has been tracking shooting statistics, reported earlier this month that shootings in the city have declined, with 533 fewer shootings as of Aug. 1 than the same time in 2017.

Harvard sorority chapter closes its doors in response to school's social club sanctions

The Ivy League institution's new rules penalize single-gender social clubs, so Delta Gamma has closed its campus chapter.

KRISTIN TOUSSAINT
kristin.toussaint@metro.us

The Harvard sorority chapter of Delta Gamma has closed in response to the university's sanctions against single-gender social groups on its Cambridge campus.

Delta Gamma's shuttering marks the first such single-gender social group to halt its operations in response to Harvard's new rules, according to The Harvard Crimson, which first reported the closing.

In a statement, the national Delta Gamma sorority said that it approved a request by its Zeta Phi Cambridge (formerly Zeta Phi-Harvard) branch to close, a decision the Cambridge charter voted to do back in May 2018. The Harvard sorority chapter of Delta Gamma was established in 1994 and since then, 781 women have been initiated into Zeta Phi, per the organization.

"This decision does not mean that we are succumbing to the university's new sanctions and policies regarding participation in unrecognized single-gender organizations like ours," national Delta Gamma Fraternity President Wilma Johnson Wilbanks said in a statement. "We will continue to champion our right to exist on campuses everywhere. We believe the value of sorority is too great."

Harvard has long butted heads with its campus social groups. Though the university has not banned these groups outright, it did institute a series of sanctions penalizing group members.

In May 2016, the school announced sanctions barring members of single-gender groups — including Harvard sororities, fraternities and final clubs — from receiving campus leadership positions, captain roles on varsity teams

Delta Gamma, Alpha Phi and Kappa Alpha Theta released a statement in December 2017 arguing that they felt female-focused spaces were crucial to the development of women at Harvard.

In January, women across the country shared their support for the Harvard sororities by tweeting with area should conditions for single-gender organizations improve."

"On behalf of the Fraternity Council, I would like to thank our collegians and alumnae for the courage they have shown throughout the last several years," Wilbanks said in her statement. "We respect the chapter's decision and understand that the university's sanctions resulted in an environment in which Delta Gamma could not thrive. We sincerely hope this changes in the future."

Though Delta Gamma is the first Harvard sorority to close, others have changed in light of the sanctions. Kappa Alpha Theta recently announced that it voted to go gender-neutral in the fall, thus avoiding the sanctions against single-gender social clubs. However, this means the sorority has had to cut its affiliation with its national association and become a new organization: Theta Zeta Xi.

Another Harvard sorority, Kappa Kappa Gamma, voted to become gender-neutral under the new social club name the Fleur-de-Lis back in January.

"We will continue to champion our right to exist on campuses everywhere."

and endorsement from the school for fellowships.

The social club sanctions went into effect with the Harvard class of 2021. In a university statement in 2016, then-Harvard President Drew Faust said that such single-gender clubs "encourage a form of self-segregation that undermines the promise offered by Harvard's diverse student body."

Immediately after that announcement, Harvard sororities spoke out against the sanctions.

the hashtags #HearHer-Harvard and #WithoutMySorority, sharing personal stories of why being in a female-focused social group was important to them.

Delta Gamma approved the Zeta Phi Cambridge chapter's request to close after a 60-day period in which members were encouraged to submit letters supporting or opposing the proposed closing.

In the statement, the national Delta Gamma organization said that it hopes to return to the Cambridge

No easy path to curing opioid crisis, say recovering addicts

People who have struggled with dependence talk about how medication-assisted treatment helped.

sam.newhouse@metro.us

Opioid-addiction recovery may seem impossible, as the crisis sweeping America has only been worsened by the stigma of addiction. But addicts who have recovered and been able to return to leading productive lives say that a cure is possible and fellow addicts need time and support, not to be labeled as dangerous "junkies."

"It's very difficult for people to want to come out and say stuff when there's this immediate backlash," said Eric Dyer, 27, a painkiller addict who has been in recovery for about six years and now works as an attorney in upstate New York. "The only way to reduce the stigma is to have people share their story and be open about it."

Dyer started smoking marijuana and drinking heavily as a teenager, but by 18 had become addicted to opiates.

"Opioids had a unique effect because it was everything I could have ever wanted in any type of feeling and it was given to me in this small pill," he said.

Dyer was 21 when his then-girlfriend discovered his stash of painkillers, flushed them down the toilet and contacted his family for help pushing him into rehab.

In rehab, Dyer connected his success with using Vivitrol, a once-a-month injection of naltrexone. The medication helped him gradually return to a of feeling being "OK," and he went on to finish college and law school.

But he called his situation — with a supportive family and health insurance — "incredibly unique." For many other opioid users without that support, he acknowledged getting to the physical and mental state that allows for ongoing sobriety can be seemingly impossible.

Meagan Kenney, 33, who is in recovery from heroin and fentanyl addiction, describes herself as someone who survived as a "functioning addict" for years who could hold down a job. But since getting clean, she said she has recovered a level of enjoyment in day-to-day-life she no longer thought possible.

From left, Meagan Kenney and Eric Dyer both credit their recover from opioid addiction to medication-assisted treatment and strong support networks, a holistic approach that Phoenix House CEO Dr. Ben Nordstrom says is crucial for all patients. PROVIDED

"The reason I share my story is I want people to not lose hope. Even when you don't recognize yourself anymore, that person is still there," said Kenney, who has been sober for six years and works as an addiction therapist. "I'm a firm believer in neuroplasticity."

Kenney decided to pursue treatment with Vivitrol in 2012 after meeting another former user who had used Vivitrol to get clean. She said the nature of the monthly shot helped her break her daily routine of drug use.

"Vivitrol allowed me, without having a derailling opioid relapse, to start to repair the holes in my soul that led to my addiction in the first place and really putting in that work that went way beyond it to a spiritual growth," Kenney said. "I just desperately wanted to put this addiction behind me and get back to my life that I hadn't seen in years."

Kenney, whose father had been an addict as well, said therapy was key to her success, getting to the root of childhood depression, social anxiety and other problems that drove her to use drugs.

"When it finally clicked — it was really just like the biggest relief," she said. "It was like the weight of the world fell off my shoulders. All I had to do was show up for this shot. Not the full-time job of being a drug addict."

"Ballers" season 4 debuts this weekend. ALL PHOTOS HBO

'Ballers' star Rob Corddry on the Rock's sex appeal

Ahead of season 4's debut, the comic actor discusses working with Dwayne Johnson on the hit HBO series.

ANDREW HUSBAND
letters@metro.us

When "Ballers" star Rob Corddry is approached by a fan, he generally knows what they're going to ask him about based on several profiles he has developed over the years.

"If they're 60 to 70-year-old Alan Alda types with NPR tote bags and round eyeglasses, they're usually asking about 'The Daily Show.' But 'Ballers' is tougher," he laughs. "The people who most often come up to me on the street and say something about 'Ballers' are women, which surprised me at first. It didn't strike me as a show that females would like."

The "Hot Tub Time Machine" actor doesn't possess the numbers to prove this, but he's pretty sure he knows why all these women watch the program. "I think the Rock is very appealing to women. He's appealing to everyone," says Corddry, "but I imagine the women like him very much as well."

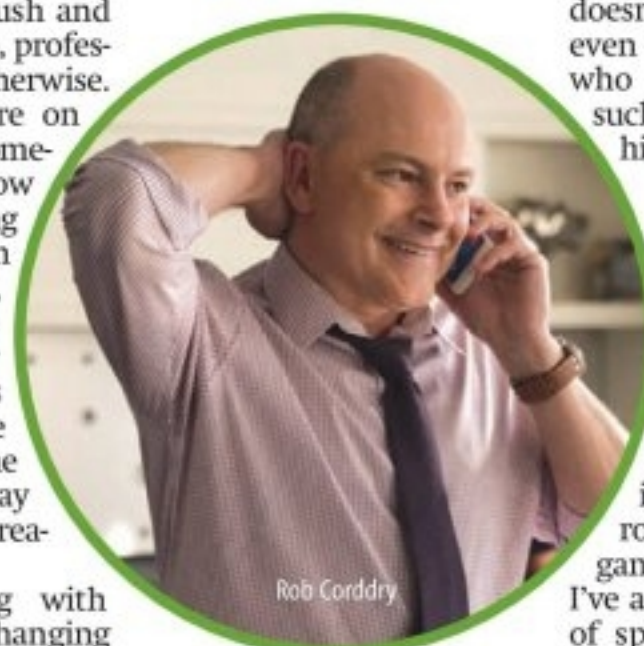

For the past three seasons, Corddry and Dwayne "The Rock" Johnson have played sports financial consultants Joe Krutel and Spencer Strassmore in "Entourage" and "Boardwalk Empire" alum Stephen Levinson's "Ballers." In season four, which premieres this Sunday on HBO, the pair attempts to recuperate season three's losses by delving into the world of extreme sports.

Throughout the series, Spencer and Joe have had what Corddry describes as a "push and pull" relationship, professionally and otherwise. Sometimes they're on the same page, sometimes not. Now that they're trying to come out on top this season, the partners are working together as uniformly as possible. As the Corddry notes, he prefers it this way for a particular reason.

"I like acting with Dwayne. I like hanging out with him. He's fun to be on set with," he says. "If our characters are at odds, that usually means I'm going to have scenes with somebody else and our storylines will veer away from each other. So if I had choose one path, I like it when we're a team working together rather than not."

Rob Corddry

Joe and Spencer's story is one of many aspects of "Ballers" that Corddry, who considers himself an avid football fan, appreciates. He also acknowledges the depths Levinson and the writers go to infuse the show with such human elements.

Crunching numbers doesn't hold his interest, even when "Ballers" fans who are interested in such details approach him.

"They want to talk stats," he says. "I'm a big, big football fan, but I don't remember who scored the most points on the ground for the Rams. I'm more into the drama and romance of a football game, the poetry of it. I've actually had a couple of sports financial managers contact me on Twitter, offering their consulting services. You know what? I think I know enough. What we're doing, in terms of the numbers, isn't brain surgery.

"Numbers and stats and weird obscure things do not a good story make," Corddry adds with a laugh. Even so, he recognizes the importance of the subject material to the core of the "Ballers" story, as well as the effect it has had on his wife's understanding of sports.

"My wife, who can't stand sports, was watching a football game with me, and the guy did a flip over the endzone," he recalls. "Just from having watched 'Ballers,' and what she absorbed from it, my wife went, 'You're going to do a flip in the endzone? Come on, you're making 10 over 7!' And I just fell more in love with her at that moment."

"Ballers" season 4 premieres Sunday, Aug. 12, at 10 p.m. on HBO.

The summer of Glen Powell

The actor's big year continues with Netflix's "The Guernsey Literary and Potato Peel Pie Society."

GREGORY WAKEMAN
Gregory.Wakeman@metro.us

It's been a pretty great summer for Glen Powell.

Back in June, "Set It Up" was released to critical acclaim and has since generated a devout online following. Powell was also in the running to star opposite Tom Cruise in "Top Gun 2," only to lose the role to Miles Teller.

However, Powell once again proved he is the new nicest guy in Hollywood by impressing Cruise so much that he is in negotiations to star in a role created for him in the sequel.

The summer of Powell continues apace later this week when he appears in "The Guernsey Literary and Potato Peel Pie Society." Powell plays Lily James' love interest in the romantic dramedy in the 1946-set dramedy. It revolves around a London-based writer exchanging letters with a reading group based in Guernsey, the remote British island that was under German occupation in the Second World War.

We caught up with Powell to talk about the film.

What did you think of the script, and what stood out about your character, Mark Reynolds? What is interesting is that Mike Newell was the magnet that drew everyone to this movie.

Obviously the script was incredible — Tom Bezucha wrote an amazing script off an amazing book. But, really, Mike Newell has been a hero of mine for a while. So he was the reason I signed on. Obviously getting to kiss Lily James for an entire movie was a selling point in itself. There was a lot of great things starring in this movie. Obviously, being the lone American in a British cast was awesome because I had never worked with the Brits in this way. It is a very different experience, and I liked that, for the most part.

What was so attractive about working with Newell?

One of the things that I think Mike brings to the directing chair is enthusiasm. He truly gets so much joy out of directing. He is really an actor's director. Sometimes, with these big cinematic experiences, it is not really about the performances — it is about everything but the performances. But with Mike, it is about these intimate stories.

What really stuck out was just how likable Mark is. Did you feel a pressure to make him unlikable?

I think as a person I am likable, just not likable enough.

That is a very harsh way of describing yourself.

My mom says that to me all the time. She says, "It's good. You'll work. You'll get work. You're likable enough. But not likable where you'll get to be the hero." I was like, "Mom, you're really mean. I need to move." The great part about Mark is that he is completely righteous. What I looked at when it came to the quest for love was, because someone is a great person doesn't mean they are a great fit. Two sides of the heart don't always complete each other in a way. And Mark is a guy that strives to show her the world and wants to give her anything and show her off and introducing to incredible and accomplished people.

But that is not what she wants. She wants to struggle. She wants to be a starving artist. She needs someone who has seen and who views themselves the same way as she does. And that is who Darcy is in this movie. The fact is I have never looked and never will view them as the movie because I feel that very few people on this planet, no matter how many horrible things they do, view themselves as the villain.

"The Guernsey Literary and Potato Peel Pie Society" debuts on Netflix Aug. 10.

The Red Sox' young outfield is currently unstoppable.

MATT BURKE
matthew.burke@metro.us

Critics have given Red Sox boss Dave Dombrowski plenty of flak over the last few years for basically trading away all the key components of the franchise's farm system in order to prioritize winning now.

Well, the Sox are not only winning right now at a record clip — they also have young superstars contributing to this success right now. Who needs a farm system when you already have young guns killing it at the major league level?

Boston has been blessed with great outfielders in its storied baseball history, but the trio of Mookie Betts, Andrew Benintendi and Jackie Bradley Jr. just might take the cake as the franchise's best outfield ever. The trio of Fred Lynn, Jim Rice and Dwight Evans were phenomenal 40 years ago, but even those legends are starting to bow down to the current crop.

"These kids are tremendous. Best outfield we've had in a long time," Evans told ESPN last year. "I never like to compare because these guys might be better than us. It's even more rewarding when you know they came out of your system. You'll see them do some great things. You'll see them do some things that hopefully they learn and get better from. There's really no telling what they can do."

In this most recent dominant stretch at Fenway, which included a four-game sweep of the rival Yankees, all facets of the Sox' loaded outfield were on display.

Bradley had yet another highlight reel catch on July 29 against the Twins when he tracked down a scorching ball to center field. According to Statcast, Bradley traveled 78 feet in 4.4 seconds before diving, catching the ball, and crashing into the Green Monster.

Bradley seems like a lock to win a Gold Glove in center as he's been making highlight-reel catches on a near-nightly basis this season.

Betts, of course, is an MVP candidate and was his sensational self in the Yankees series — playing second base for a spell when Ian Kinsler went down, all while amassing seven hits in the four-game set. In the wild 15-7 Thursday night win over New

Wednesday: Brian Johnson vs. Mike Hauschild

York, Betts had four hits, and in the Sunday night series finale he had a pair of hits, including a solo homer.

Benintendi has also had an outstanding year at the plate overall as he is hitting .302 on the season with 14 homers and 66 RBIs. He also had the biggest hit of his young career Sunday night (well, Monday morning) when he singled to center off of Yankees reliever Jonathan Holder in the 10th inning to score Tony Renda in a walk-off Red Sox win.

The best part of all? All of them — Bradley, Betts and Benintendi — are 28 or younger.

Who needs a farm system?
